CHAPTER XI. The Adventures of Laksamana and the Princess in

Laksamana as he journeyed through the forest, walking by the side of Umbra, pointed out to her, all the remarkable and beautiful natural objects he observed in the journey. In this he proved the superior character of his nature. The chief portion of mankind; whether civilized, or uncivilized give their chief, if not their only attention, to the acquisition of means for subsistence, or display; and anything not connected with their pressing individual interests, they pass by unnoticed. But superior natures, not entirely occupied with their own selfish wants, will examine with pleasure, plants, flowers, ferns, insects, shells, and all the curious things Universe. We will not suppose that Laksamana ad altogether these thoughts; as he belongs to a time, when many spirits and deities were supnoticed all things, and he wondered. Wonder and imagination belong to superior organizations. He pointed out to Umbra the stately camphor tree, that rises to a height of two hundred feet. And they observed rattans, or canes, the same with which the Coinese make so many chairs, teet in length. Some have been found in the mile long. And they passed through what appeared a dense grove of many trees, that covered more than an acre of ground. But Laksamana Then Laksamana Then Laksamana knew from what had been told him by learned men nal new stem or trunk of the tree will be surfrom one parent stock or stem.

When Laksamana observed the suffering of his brave men, who had pledded through a difficult and tangled forest all day, he began to look around for a spring of a small stream of water, near some place suitable for a camp for the night. And after a while observing a small pool ordered a halt, and when his men noticed the beauty of the place, and the cool freshness of the water, they cried out with delight-"O, what sweet place-Let us drink and rest!" His men who now joined him, propesed to make a firm pathway with sticks and stones, and clods of earth, to where the monster was stuck fast; and then they proposed to build up a fire near by, and roast her to death. But the Hero turned upon them with scorn, and said: " No, though she is a savage that would have no mercy on us, she is a woman; and men should never put to death a helpless woman, whatever she may have done.

He ordered however the firm pathway suggested to be made through the yielding mud; and when near the now helpless femule, he said to her in of the natural world; so as to study somewhat the designs of the Intelligence that planned the stand up to fight thee, and a woman too. A Peaceful Victory.
